

Business Manager

Vol. 23 No. 02 August, 2020 Single Copy Rs. 125/-

Making HR People Complete

Amit Das

Srinidhi Dasaka

Simin Askari

Harjeet Khanduja

Preeti D'mello

Vineet Mangal

Mridula Sankhyayan

Dr. Sanjay Muthal

Sai Kumar Chandran

Uma Rao

Ishita Sengupta Mondal

Prasad Kurian

Sudip Sinha

Subir Verma

Employee
Mental Wellness

In This Issue

15 Analytics - priority area of focus for HR

The ability to link business performance parameters with personal aspirations and the growth path of the employees on the strength of predictive and prescriptive analytics should help create an environment of trust and transparency. An written by Dr. Anupriyo Mallick

17 Corporate lessons from covid-19

The pandemic will compel the business world to take a fresh look at how business was done pre-covid and bring required changes not in processes but also in approach. Inability to adapt to new order will certainly wipe out many from the scene. An written by Dr. Aparna Sharma

Solutions provided here are in context to narrated facts & not in general.

54

helpLINE

Anil Kaushik | Management Expert -HR & IR

Workers, after restarting the business, if remain absent even after reporting call, are not entitled to any wages, even in lockdown period.

56-60

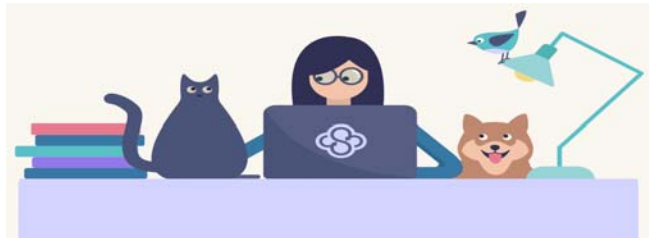

RECENT IMPORTANT LABOUR JUDGMENTS

From the Court Room

61

WORK FROM HOME MAY BE A NIGHTMARE

Working alone and independently with just a computer screen to keep the company of an employee is vastly different from the collective environment of an office. It is a new concept and an experiment.

An written by H. L. Kumar

CASE STUDY

63

LEADING IMPATIENTLY

Many times team leaders bounced back on them who raised the queries and expected guidance and solutions which resulted into increasing disengagement and absence from work among team members. -BM Editorial Team

CASE ANALYSIS

65-66

1. Co. should discourage short term solutions - Bhaskar Dharival
2. Re-skill or up-skill the teams, not lay them off - Mihir Gosalia

Dr. Aparna Sharma, Board Member, Thought Leader, Best Selling Author & Motivational Speaker, Mumbai

Corporate lessons from covid-19

Our lives can change very quickly. The current crisis situation is the best evidence of this fact!

There are huge efforts being made across the world to contain COVID-19. Even once we overcome the immediate crisis & crawl back to business as usual, it will leave a long tail of implications for businesses to manage. Crises of any form are rarely isolated and contained - they tend to unfold in unpredictable peaks and troughs - and that's why COVID-19 should focus the minds of business leaders across the globe.

Managing crisis is a fact of business life. It's not a matter of whether a crisis will hit, but when - and whether a business survives intact is directly related to how well it is prepared.

The COVID-19 outbreak presents specific potential business challenges around people and commercial operations. On an operational level, the impact of the fear factor on the workforce (and potentially on the reputation of the business if it's directly affected) is very relevant. In such circumstances, timely and effective communication with both internal and external stakeholders is absolutely critical.

Business leaders may consider:

1. Resilience : Its not just a catchphrase; it's a necessity, and it's having its moment. Every single board of directors needs learn from this global challenge and invest more time and thought in exploring where its business faces other risks. Resilience in the face of fast-changing attitudes and actions on the part of a company's workforce also present questions of fundamental importance. And we also know that political change can come overnight and test our models. The simple question that is haunting most business leaders is: Is your business resilient in the face of massive change? We are experiencing in real time how hard it can be when the answer is "NO".

2. Acknowledge Interdependent globalized world : It should go without saying that we are all connected and interdependent; the virus proves just how true that is. But in an era when powerful political leaders call for walls and barriers and play to people who can be swayed in that direction, this difficult episode teaches us the importance of collaborative solutions.

Credit should be given to French President Emmanuel Macron for convening a virtual G7

The pandemic will compel the business world to take a fresh look at how business was done pre-covid and bring required changes not in processes but also in approach. Inability to adapt to new order will certainly wipe out many from the scene.

Summit and to the tireless workers at the World Health Organization (WHO) for providing valid and valuable information, enabling testing and supporting health systems that need it most. In short, we need each other; and crises often remind us of that. This one certainly is doing exactly that. It is a folly to suffer the negative consequences of our connectedness without maximizing the benefits. Business has a strong interest in advocating for open societies, effective public governance and the rules-based international system that has come under attack in recent years.

3. Put your crisis and business continuity plans to test : Most businesses will have crisis/incident and business continuity plans (BCP) - and if you don't have one, now is the time to put one in place. Regularly stress testing these is essential. COVID-19 has already revealed flaws in some plans. So, one needs to learn from it & plug it back into the plan & make every effort to make it fool proof.

4. Create a strong, cross-functional response team : A crisis like COVID-19 can have an impact on every part of the business. The response demands high-level sponsorship and cross-functional working. A core team must be formed overseen by the CEO (usually drawn from HR, Legal and Communications), to provide the framework and strategic guidance, supported by an extended team to address the specific actions needed to get through the crisis. However, this may vary from organisation to organisation.

5. Focus on data : Reliable data underpins both crisis planning and response. PwC's 2019 Global Crisis Survey establishes that three-quarters of those in a better place post-crisis strongly recognise the importance of establishing facts accurately during the crisis. It's essential that the crisis plan outlines how information will flow and that everyone has confidence in its veracity. Strong data also reinforces a central element of crisis planning - exploring different scenarios and how they could affect the business in the short, medium and long term.

6. Keep your people and working environment safe : The ongoing situation with COVID-19 means that employees, or the potentially impacted communities they work in, will be looking to their organisation for a response, guidance and regular communications. Review travel rules, HR policies, first aid plans and create safe ways to exercise the arrangements. The working environment should also be considered so that one can continue to provide a safe place for employees and visitors to work as intended or in the current situation provide the option to Work from Home (WFH).

The response window for a crisis is typically measured in months, while recovery is measured in years. But a crisis doesn't necessarily mean disaster. An incident managed well allows one to develop one's immune system, enabling one to take on riskier opportunities, with the confidence that future threats will be spotted and addressed quickly. That's the key to sustainable competitive advantage. EM